Children's choice of food is not only about what they're eating, but also about who they're with. Research shows children watch their parents to decide which food to like or not. So if parents want to ask their children to eat more vegetables, they should eat vegetables themselves in front of the children.

The research shows babies are cleverer than people think. They will eat more when other people eat with them. When they eat with happy people, they will get happy memories about food. Dr. Liberman and her team studied 32 children, aged just over one. They let the children watch a movie. In the movie, two actors were eating different kinds of food and talking about a bowl. The children did not care much about the bowl. But when the two actors disagreed about the food, the children were confused (困惑的) and watched carefully.

"When they see someone eating food, they can learn about the food through the person's reaction to the food, such as whether it is delicious, and also learn about the people who are eating the food," Dr. Liberman explained.
