How are you in Shanghai? Meg and I are in London today. It's winter now, and the weather here is cold. London is a beautiful and modern city. There are many beautiful buildings in London, such as the British Museum, the Big Ben and so on. We have much fun and learn a lot in the museum. We can also see lots of red buses in the streets.

Tomorrow is Christmas Day, and there are many people at Harrods. They are buying Christmas gifts there. In the park, children are playing with snow. Everyone is happy. By the way, the tea here is great. Here, the English often put some milk, honey or sugar into the tea, which is different from China. And Meg is going to buy some black tea for you.

We are going back to Shanghai soon and we miss you very much.

Love,
Richard

If you think iPhones are expensive, think about those who have to work months to buy one.

A person in New York has to work just three days to be able to buy a new iPhone; people in Beijing have to spend 27 days at the office.

That information is from a new index (索引) of pay and prices in 71 cities collected by Swiss bank UBS. The index, which comes out every three years, show the rich people of Zurich have to work the least, putting in just under 21 hours on the job before having the money for the must-have phone. Londoners have to work a little more - 41 hours - while workers in Mexico City have to work well over 200 hours, making the phone too rich for many. In Ukraine, it is worse than all other places. People there have to work about 627 hours or 78 days. In Nairobi and Jakarta they have to work 468 hours, or 59 days.

The research shows how expensive Apple iPhones can be for locals in many cities. That makes it easier for other companies to sell more than Apple in many nations.

For example, India's phone company Micromax has become the country's largest phone seller, according to a research company. In fact, India doesn't have an Apple Store because the products are too expensive. Beijing phone maker Xiaomi has become one of the world's top five phone makers, and often sells more than Apple in China. Earlier this year Xiaomi had its best sales day ever, selling 2.12 million phones in 24 hours.

- A. The Apple iPhone is the best phone in the world
- B. Other phone companies are just as good as Apple
- C. Not everyone can easily buy Apple iPhone

50.What can we learn from the passage?

- A. Research doesn't help in phone sales information.
- B. People should work harder so that they can buy an iPhone.
- C. Xiaomi will be more popular than iPhone around the world.
- D. Phones from other companies are less expensive for locals than iPhones.

In American high school, most students take English, science, math and history. These are basic courses and each course is as useful as others. In English class, the students study grammar and famous literature（文学作品）. In science class, they study biology, chemistry and physics. History is more interesting for some students because they can learn about important cultures in the United States.

Students take other courses, too. These are electives（选修课）. Some of them are music, home economics and computer science. Students don't have to take all of these courses. Some learn music because they feel it is more enjoyable. Some study computer science because they think it is more practical（实用的）. In each class, teachers give students exams.
